Column One by David Courtney

THE other day Mr. Sharretz said in the Knesset words to this effect: Look at the frontiers — are they not quiet? And the very next morning Zvi Litzman and Eliezer Katz, from the settlement of Mevo Beit, were found dead on a road, shot through and through. The incident breaks a record of two months, or more, which very properly excites the public. Look at the frontiers — are they not quiet?

THE leader-politicians and the cartoonists and some politicians are repeating the Prime Minister's words in tones of decision; for it is natural that even responsible leaders of public opinion should become shocked and angry when two innocent settlers and fellow-citizens are cold-bloodedly killed. But however natural it may be, its effects are unfortunate and perhaps unjust. For in truth, the wicked deed of two innocent men is subject to such attacks. Happily for most of us, it remains statesmanship in spite of the attacks, as Mr. Sharretz has shown. The wicked deed of two innocent men is subject to such attacks. Happily for most of us, it remains statesmanship in spite of the attacks, as Mr. Sharretz has shown.

THE murder of the two settlers is a tragedy; but doubly so, not because it is an example of the gruesome state of the border between Israel and Jordan but because a head of criminals has thrown back in Mr. Sharretz's teeth his courageous pacifist and just words of Monday night. Also, the murder is a tragedy because it is a reminder of the fact that the border is not quiet, and that there has been, indeed, relative tranquillity along its singular length for two months or more.

THE difference between the world between restraint and appeasement. The latter word leaps to the political sorcerer's tongue like an incantation whenever he is asked to sit down to balance the prospects and uses of war and peace — an exercise in statesmanship. The world between restraint and appeasement. The latter word leaps to the political sorcerer's tongue like an incantation whenever he is asked to sit down to balance the prospects and uses of war and peace — an exercise in statesmanship.

RESTRRAINT, however, is the face of provocation, needs encouragement and it is clear that Israel has deserved encouragement from those in a position to give it. If Mr. Sharretz is to explain the policy of moderation and good sense briefly outlined by him on Monday night, he must show returns for it. In the tragic instance of the recent murders it must become clear that Jordan is not a peaceful neighbor and that it is not a policy of moderation and good sense to give it. If Mr. Sharretz is to explain the policy of moderation and good sense briefly outlined by him on Monday night, he must show returns for it.

Nasser Declines to Receive Menders or Visit Ankara

The Egyptian Premier, Col. Abdul Nasser, has rejected the invitation of the Turkish Premier, Mr. Adnan Menderes, to visit Ankara, and also turned down the latter's request to visit Cairo.

Earlier reports stated that the Turkish leader had hoped to convince Abdul Nasser that Egypt could join the new Turco-Iraqi alliance without sacrificing her leadership of the Arab bloc.

The Foreign Ministry in Baghdad declared in a statement last night that "it is a matter of course" that the new pact will convene the conference without the participation of Iraq. It stated that Iraq reserves the right to regard any pact which is adopted at the meeting as not binding on her.

BBC, Religion, Stir British Wrath

The customary forecasts tended to predict a return to normal in all spheres of public life, "normal" meaning any degree of tension slightly below that of World War II and the early post-war years. So far as Britain is concerned, "normal" is unmistakable without a loud protest of the BBC, the latter being a controversial institution debate on either (a) religion or

(b) the BBC. It is therefore a healthy sign that the month of January has seen a revival of the old controversy between churchmen and rationalists, and a new over the BBC, the latter made itself responsible for an attack on churchmen regard as an attack on religion and rationalists as a raucous, feeble expression of their lack of faith. If that is not evidence that things are getting back to normal, one would like to know what is.

What set the ball rolling was a lady lecturer, Mrs. Margaret of some of the "Times" and most of the Conservative children should be taught to
